1 Read the article. Then complete the fact file below.

In 1933, 13-year-old Ray Harryhausen went to see King Kong – one of the first monster films. How did they make King Kong look so real? What made the big gorilla move? Ray wanted answers to his questions. He returned to see the film again and again, and King Kong changed his life.

At home in Los Angeles, the boy made models of prehistoric dinosaurs and other creatures in the family garage. His models looked real. He gave them fur and feathers, claws and beaks and long tails. To make his first film, he took many photos of his creatures. He changed the position of the monster from picture to picture. This gave the impression of movement.

Ray Harryhausen became a famous fantasy film producer. He created all the original models for his films by hand, so it took him years to finish a film. Sometimes he used parts of his models again: a creature's leg in one film became a monster's tail in another. When Harryhausen was 90, he gave his collection of 20,000 models and drawings to the National Media Museum in Bradford, England. He died in 2013.
